6. Contextual Paragraph	Mayor Robert Speer made his mark on the Denver landscape by participating in the “City Beautiful” movement made popular during the late 1800s and early 1900s. Progressive leaders used the idea of promoting civic and moral virtue through urban planning and the beautification of architecture as a response to the crowded living conditions in major urban areas. The overcrowding was due to a population boom attributed to immigration, movement from rural areas, and increased birth rates. Spurred by the World’s Columbian Exhibition in Chicago in 1893, this movement created a surge of neoclassical architecture throughout the United States. Speer traveled throughout the United States, Europe, and to the Exposition as well, joining with other leaders who thought the best way to combat ugly, dirty, overcrowded cities was to create a sense of European beauty. This entailed the use of white neoclassical buildings based on the design of large European cities and the provision of open spaces for citizens to enjoy. Speer committed to this design plan and brought it to Denver, clearing a wide swath of land in central Denver west of the Capitol and constructing Civic Center, which is now a designated National Historic Landmark. In addition, he worked to plant trees in city parks and gave away thousands of trees to be planted by city residents. Today, Mayor Speer’s vision is still reflected in the beauty of Denver’s Civic Center district and throughout the city.
7. Connection to Historic Preservation	The History Colorado State Historical Fund, Historic Denver, and many other organizations and citizens have worked collaboratively with the owners of local properties to landmark many of the historic buildings and neighborhoods created during the City Beautiful Movement including the Denver Civic Center Complex and our Capitol.
